From the Chicago Journal. As the train rumbles through the Indian villages between Thornton and Albuquerque, N. M., it skirts the base of a flatquerque, N. M., it skirts the base of a flat-topped hill, once a part of the mesa, now standing alone in the middle of the valley, On the top of this hill, on the side nearest the railroad, stands a wooden cross. As one looks out from the car window it seems strange to see this cross standing against the sky above the purple lava-rocks which crown the hill. Once there were threa crosses—two have crumbled. were three crosses—two have crumbled.
Twenty years ago, a widowed Mexican lived near the base of the hill with his three daughters. He tilled the land adjoining that of the San Filippe Indians. The oldest daughter had just grown to young womanhood. The old man was jealous of the young sultors who called upon his daughter. "She is too young to leave me yet," he said.

A scourge of smallpox swept the Indian villages and the oldest daughter of the Mexican was the first to die. Within a week the three daughters were dead. The father laid them to rest, with the hill for a monument, and placed on the summit the three crosses. As darkness fell the Indians of San Filippe saw the Mexican planting the last cross. He was never seen again. Some said that he had gone into the mountains to prospect. Some said he had become demented and had wandered into the mountains and starved. Some said that, crossing the Rio Grande that night to pray for his children in old San Filippe church, he had missed the ford in the darkness and was carried down.

But the wooden cross still stands against the sky.
